I'm still old fashion I guess, using maps. This Italy map is not only great for driving but, I used it heavily for planning destinations in the Italian Alps (dolomites) and through the Brenner Pass into Austria. Knowing how far and the name of the village or next town is peace of mind that you can't get by using a GPS only. This map is large and very detailed showing the smallest off roads for extra site seeing adventures. Even if you only use it once driving through Italy, its well worth the investment!

Used this on a recent road trip throughout Italy and it helped me a lot. We also used GPS, but I like getting my bearings with a map. For example, I would not have known we were looking at Mt. Vesuvius, but the map clearly showed it. I like that it's in Italian, because all the signs of course are. And if you're in Italy of course you want to try to speak Italian!

Printed maps still have their place in our digital world. I have this nice big map on my wall and am plotting out our trip to Italy later this year. It great!

I'm giving this map 3 stars, though perhaps that's a bit unfair. I needed a map to get me from the Rome airport (FCO) up to Umbria, and this did the trick. What the map cannot accomplish, however, is a simplification of the Italian roads and naming conventions. In that respect, I suppose you could say that this map was perfect in that it mirrored reality. Roads change number almost at random it seems, and a map (at least for me) was most useful to ensure I was headed in the correct direction (that is, East, West, etc., as opposed to "Umbria"). For that, you simply have to watch the road signs. In all, this map did what we needed it to do - help chart long distances - but for anything more than that, you'll need one of Michelin's excellent regional maps (which were great).

Compared to US roads and highways, Italian roads are very complex and confusing. While this map did provide a great high level overview of the major highways, it wasn't really able to help you in navigating through cities, or back onto the highways from where you are in the city. I highly recommend a Garmin with either the Europe or Italy map updates. While the Garmin isn't perfect either, it will get you there - or at least close.

Was hoping map had major cities like Milano enlarged, but probably will get a map there?

Thought this was the best detailed map of the entire country whether traveling in a group or solo. Helps if you understand some Italian

Excellent driving map to supplement a GPS.
