(re)Visiting the Machine in the Garden, by Thomas Fisher: Across fields plowed into variegated patterns, past farm sheds wrapped in rusting metal, down a logging road threaded through a deciduous forest, you come upon this house, suddenly, as if it were forgotten in the woods. Looking, at first, like an old ore dock by the lake, a common sight north of here, the Type/Variant House, as architect Vincent James calls it, seems dislocated in time as well as in space. Its facade, composed of stacked, nearly windowless volumes wrapped in oxidizing copper, appears modern and antiquated, robust and ruinous, all at once.

really good imagery

Despite its modest format, this elegant monograph more than does justice to Vincent James' extraordinary copper pavilions floating in a birch forest, comprehensively illustrated here with a wide range of visual materials, from early design sketches, construction photographs, and extensive working drawings to exquisite images of the finished building through four seasons of rain, mist, snow, and sun. Fold-out plans are provided in the inside cover, with a location key to all photos for readers' convenience. The graphic design of the book is clearly a labor of love, far beyond the often perfunctory standard of architectural publishing. Professional readers will regret the absence of scale information, but this is a minor lapse amidst the books many virtues.
